THEME

Women's history is situated at the interface of feminism and history as a discipline. The first wave of feminism in Europe triggered the early ideas of women's history. The second wave with roots in America during the 1960s not only attacked patriarchy but also pointed out the absence of women from the textual and contextual domains of history and living. In the Indian academy, influenced by the first and second wave, historians have attempted to understand gender inequality and oppression as well as the marginalization of the subaltern and the Muslim woman. We look forward to the two esteemed speakers to enlighten us on these issues.
